Inside these homes show varying degrees of culture. Some of them have their walls covered with white cloth, much fluted and adorned with rows of lace in lieu of wallpaper. Still others, however, and these are in the majority, are forced to content themselves with a conting of whitowash tinged with the blue that is so popular in Roumania. The humblest simply have the wattlings filled in with earth to keep out the winerwinds. Here the laborer sleeps and spends the winter.

In other seasons at sunrise the men of the family and all the women except the one whose duty it is to attend to the home take their way to the fields, there to plow and sown and reap in most primitive fashion.
